A week or so ago, I got into an elevator. There were normal rows of numbers and buttons, so I pressed 5 and stood ready to climb. Nothing happened. I pressed the button again, this time a little harder. Still, nothing happened. Finally, my friend reached over my shoulder and pushed the square to the right of number 5. It got the light up and the elevator started moving. Dumb me, I said aloud. My friend shook her head and smiled. I think it's more like dumb design, he said. And he was right. The elevator was designed so that it wasn't immediately clear which button to press. It took me out of my natural frame of reference and made me change my behavior. And that's the hallmark of dumb design. Yet dumb design doesn't result from a lack of consideration. The opposite is true. Sometimes it is overconsiderate and exaggerated. Smart design, on the other hand, happens with instinct. It draws on something that is more physical than intellectual, reflex over the thought process. Smart design is not just what the consumer wants, but also how they want it. Good design gives a consumer the benefit of an existing mental model from a work to another to the fullest means of engagement by following clear yet subtle cues, whether a consumer exists with one product or service in a seamless fashion. Related: Need a new design? 5 reasons to crowdsourcing it. Don Norman, a cognitive scientist and usability expert, describes the design as acting as a communication between the object and the user. In his book, The Design of Everyday Things, Norman acknowledged people's tendency to mistake themselves for misusing an object. Your classic example How to dial on a A reference to the quadrilateral of the burner. Sometimes the Left Front feels like it should be labeled right left again and again. If a design element stumbles people again and again, it's dumb design and probably hasn't been tested in the real world for spontaneity and efficacy. So why is so little smart design filtered into everyday, mainstream experiences? Why is there still door handles that look as if they should be pulled, when in fact the user needs to push? The notion of design as a communicator is a major shift from the way it has long been marketed as a decorative application in the United States, a way to create something beautiful. The role of design is not to create something beautiful. This is to make something useful. And while very well done, the design also makes one thing delightful. Beauty may be a product of usability by nice, but the goal should never be. As German designer Dieter Rams said in his 10 principles of design, only well-executed objects can be beautiful. Designers and business builders who are smart will design in a way that lets people do what they want to do in advance. Narrow the meaning of design for one of the better serving people. The design must be clear, joyous, reassuring and capable. Heck, it must also be empowered, in terms of allowing people what they want and enjoy what they are. Here are three elements involved in creating smart design and an organization that supports it: Related: Editor Notes: Design Intelligence 1. Consider commitment to good design. The design does not start with a sketch. It starts with an intention. I built my company door with designers from the moment it was a complete sentence in my mind, knowing that the idea was only as good as execution. Make it designable to make it a success, especially if it's online, but helps people stay offline. Think of the comprehensive and definitively as good design, the first moment users exist from a company to discover when they bring an object with them to the sidewalk or into their partner or family life. 2. Designers should be on the table. Designers are quickly involved and ongoing in the decision-making process. As deep thinkers in the field of how things work and look, designers bring an overall perspective to problem solving and empathy for a range of scenarios and roles. A design team will question everyone in a single meeting, connect, prove, improve, lead and learn. A designer's ability to look at things from micro to macro, standing in other people's shoes and clearly articulating a way of reasoning enables a company to make tangible progress at every step. 3. Stand up for something. When an entrepreneur makes a product or a company, he or she makes a promise to the world about how that thing will work and make a contribution. Rarely has this promise turned into a literal translation of the concept. Execution of the idea becomes a story of usability, by design A depiction of life done. Entrepreneur is big about an instinct How it can all work and how the product can fit into people's lives. So the designer can take this impulse to champion not only the finer tactical points of a design, but also what it represents emotionally, behaviourally and collectively. PHOTO: Michelle WooThis In the summer, I've been looking for baby projects that have some advantages in them — stuff that can be worked over the course of days or weeks. I landed on an activity that's easy, requires some supply and makes me feel like a magician: I blew a coloring page. Specifically, I uploaded a color page file to Staples.com and extended it as a 3-by-4-foot engineering print. These large black and white prints are generally used for engineering or architectural plans. For about $7, we now have a mural on our wall, ready for color by my 6-year-old daughter, or who feels like picking up any other crayons. The color page I've chosen was designed by PicCandle on Etsy I wanted a print that had a good amount of detail, but not where waldo level complexity is. Last night, baby baby Working on it, and then I jumped at one point too. The color is really relaxing. To create a supersized color page of your own, here's what to do: Choose a high-resolution color page. There are plenty of free or low-cost PDF downloads online. If you have a very small child, you can choose a simple illustration, but for older children with more patience, you can look at mandalas or other designs from adult coloring books. Create your engineering print. Staples, FedEx and Parabo all allow you to upload your design to your sites for printing. You can preview or resize your print on your own with an online image resizer, or use the Fit Content option for the printer's paper, if it's one. It's fine if there's some white space along borders. Tape your massive color page on a wall or lay it across a table or floor, and then let your child go at it. It's also a fun activity for play dates and parties. Finally, you have a huge work of art.
